The 13 Best Android Phones in 2019 The changing nature of consumer computing means that, in the next few years, traditional PCs might be on their way out. By 2025, they'll be the norm. The rise of the smartphone has put the PC market into decline. It might seem surprising that we're about to start talking about laptops again. But the truth is smartphones have become too good, too fast. In many ways, they have captured our attention, our minds, our hearts. Laptops are old tech, they're slow, they don't always work well enough. The companies that make them are tied to specific operating systems. And no one has cracked the code on making a device that's so small and so light that we can barely notice it's there. We've seen smartphones usurp their own predecessors in a similar way. The iPhone in 2013 started an era of "smartphones killed the pc" articles.Q: Get URL and webhost using jquery I am trying to get the URL and webhost of an clicked div. The div that I clicked has a specific class, and I want to use that. The problem is that it is always using the first div, and not the one that is clicked. I've tried this:

```
$(".home-widget-img").click(function () { var url = $(this).attr("href"); var host = $("a[href='" + url + "']").attr("host"); alert(host); });
```

The is created dynamically on the click of a div. What am I doing wrong? A: As @Michael_B has noted, your anchor element is not related to the link you want. Here is one way to get the href attribute and the host attribute of the link:

```
$(document).on('click', '.home-widget-img', function () { var url = $(this).attr("href"), host = $(this).attr("host"); alert('Clicked on div:' + this.id + ' URL:' + url + '
```
